Strictly Essential Preference Marketing Stats Nasty Gal has been one of my number one go-tos for fashion fix for years - where else am I going to find Courtney Love designed babydolls or summer ready leather vans on a whim? With the original #GirlBoss Sophia Amoruso at the helm, I could be easily aware that the brand picks will always be on trend. But Amoruso stepped down as CEO of the company back in 2015, and late last year we got word that our favorite Brand Nasty is fast going under, filing for Chapter 11 bankruptcy. Believe me when I say no one was more bummed than I was. There was SOME light at the end of the tunnel, however: the site boasted a killer 70 per cent sale as part of its latest hurrah before it was due to be adopted by new management on February 28. Nasty Gal was bought by British retailer BooHoo for a cool $20 million, giving Nasty Gals (including me) everywhere hope that their favourite fashion fix could still become a reality. My hopes were quickly dashed, however, as soon as I got my first order under the new guidance. Order Hazel Choker Tee for what seemed to steal at $36, I was very happy to get my merchandise. That is, until a week later, when my package arrived containing ... a completely different dress than the one I ordered. While the style of Kayla's Graphic Shirt Dress (also $36) I got was kinda similar to the one I actually ordered, I didn't dig a wild cutout on my shoulder that appeared as it would make wearing a bra next to impossible. I could easily discern how the confusion occurred, as the tag on the dress in the bag I grabbed bore the name of the original item I wanted - Hazel Choker Tee - but the item was most definitely not what I expected. After a quick check on the Internet, I saw that my favorite Hazel goes fast: In fact, there was only one left in stock of my size on the site, which caused my sense of urgency. I thought it best to call right away to get the exchange underway, so I went to contact Except... No one was in touch with. In the Customer Care section of the site there was a usual lineup of categories, including the delivery of information, returns, size guides, TPC, and about cookies, but contact with us section was nowhere to be found. The best I could find was the US hassle-free Returns section (which is still worth it), reading: Just return your items to the following address within 28 days of the note's sending date. Please note that the refund will be made at your own expense. On the second glance, I happened to spy contact us with a button at the bottom of my email send, but clicking on it proved useless - it just spun and rotate. Being the resourceful, determined gal that I am, I refused to give up taking to Google. A quick search for Nasty Gal contact gave several methods of communication - live chat (which was still waiting for the agent long after as I gave up and returned to my computer more than three hours later), the phone number 855-627-8942 (which informed me that the Nasty Gal customer service line no longer exists), and an email that, after entering out of my official complaint, refused to actually let me press the send button (or, if it did pass, there was no confirmation of the message or indication that it worked). Time to take to social media. The tweet @NastyGal went unanswered, but I managed to spy on the following message on Twitter bio company: Need help? @NastyGalHelp'm going to take your back. Score! I typed my dilemma - for the fourth time, between chatting, emailing, regular Twitter, and helping Twitter - and after getting shared by Hey Gal, we'll get back to you, the company eventually responded (with some urging) with this: We're so bummed to hear this. Unfortunately, we are not in a way that replaces the wrong items at this time. Please return the item for a full refund - keep a postage check in case of any problems, and if there is a fee, we will refund the amount, as the goods are incorrect. We apologise for any inconvenience caused. Welp that solved the problem of returning, but I still wanted the dress I ordered - bad. I explained that although I was happy to retell the original item, I wanted to make sure that I would no longer get the wrong item, as the dress tag I received was clearly labeled incorrectly in stock. I got the following answer: We contacted the warehouse to check this, however the order can be sent before the problem is investigated. You have to get the right item, but if we mess up again, reach out and we'll get the question sorted. We apologise for any inconvenience caused. Good, good - the national nightmare is over (for now). Although within hours lost (over $36 dress, no less), my shopping saga was donezo and I could finally get on with my day, right? Incorrectly. So wrong. The email I previously sent apparently and a customer service representative came back to me with a completely different answer. Answer. we still can't view any previous Nasty Gal orders/accounts, she wrote. It seems that the change of leadership takes a little longer than expected, and we are still trying to fine-tune some of the details. Don't worry though, we're looking into this. Not wanting to waste a representative's time (ha!) I explained that it was actually taken care of; I sent the dress back to the instructions and have already ordered a new one. The representative then responded with a message that completely puzzled me. I regret the inconvenience. Unfortunately, we will not accept any income from orders placed before 28/02/2017. I understand how disappointing this is, but it has to do with a leadership transition. Let us know if you have any other issues. Embarrassed, I AGAIN tried to explain that the item I received was incorrect and that I was just sending it back for a refund since I didn't buy it from the start. In response I received this: I apologize for any confusion, but I was regarding the original order (the wrong item that you received). If you purchased it before 28.02.2017, we will not be able to accept it as a refund. We apologise for any inconvenience caused. If you have any other requests, please contact us. A what!? Now I was totally confused, and to be honest, a bit po-ed. If I sent the dress back, do I get my money back to a Twitter rep or not? Double check the date of my original order and find it to be March 4th (fu!), I realized that I was in clear and let the rep know that my order was actually placed after the date it kept referring to, so my refund should be accepted. At this point, I fully expected that it would give me the go ahead to send the item back as indicated earlier. Instead, I more or less received the same message as above, informing me that Nasty Gal would not accept returns for orders placed before 2/28 with the added line: As you've sent your back, I sent a request to see what happens to this. Please allow a few days for the relevant department to come back to me. As soon as they do, I'll email you with an update. Did this girl even read my letters, or did they send me letters in uniform? I once again informed her that my order was posted after the date of February 28 and that I had not sent the dress back yet for fear at this point not actually returning my money. In response, I received an even more confusing message. Thanks for being in touch. I'm sorry, but we can't confirm your atm request. NG recently changed leadership and we are still going through a massive transition. Because of this, we're still trying to fine-tune some of the details. This means that at this time we are unable to offer a solution for your request, so I have referred it to the appropriate department. I'll be back in touch in a few days when I get the correspondence. We are very about the inconvenience caused. (It was March 11. any additional answer.) Frustrated (and confused!) for believing, I took in company with a few expletives in mind, but I was absolutely SHOCKED at what I saw. Not only did other descriptions of similar scenarios for my own, I also saw COUNTLESS additional complaints orders not delivered at all, returns not processed after months in a row, accounts with loan balances were closed without warning, stories about 70 percent code did not apply to orders (quite a big deal given some of the site's original prices were over $1,000), and allegations of theft and fraud. Mostly work. In fact, Nice Gal's own first post was a comprehensive response to the absolute stream of complaints they were receiving, and one of their comments looked curious... Familiar. I couldn't believe my eyes. Was it a sick joke? It quickly became clear that I had stumbled upon something much bigger than me and my $36 dress, and now I was furious. I've already decided that between all the mixed messages I've received I'd rather just eat my purchase than deal with the hassle it turns out to be. I don't want to risk potentially being given a run around AGAIN for a refund of less than $50 (not to mention spending money on shipping should things fall short). However, I couldn't help but think about what would have happened if I had placed my order before February 28 and held a boatload in the process. How would I even start to fight this and pay for my money in a timely manner? Obviously, there were many others who dealt with these issues on a much larger scale, spending far more money than I had in goodwill, that they were getting some quality goods, and the thought made me both furious and positively ill. Comments on Instagram were no better. We're all tired of you, 'Hey gal-ing' asking our deets and telling us to send you a message because you keep telling us all the same: You can't access our accounts or track our orders, and you won't take responsibility for lost orders, double costs, or other set of questions customers have had prior to the jump. While the company's only recommended course of action appears to be filing a complaint with customer banks, I have filed a complaint with the Better Business Bureau on behalf of all my colleagues (former) Nasty Gals, asking that the organization do a thorough investigation of the company's new practices as a desired solution. I'm also penning this piece in hopes of saving other headaches (and lack of legitimate means!), which not only me but other ladies have gone through, all along with the shared mutual love of edgy oversized T-shirts dresses, chokers, and the like. And, if these options fail, there is also the Federal Trade Commission where you can file a complaint in the section of the Internet services site, online stores, or computers on the left side. Looks like it's time to get Nasty, ladies. You have problems with the new Nasty Gal? Tell us about it @BritandCo. (Photo via Nasty Gal/Getty)
